Understanding Communication Styles

Your Communication Style is the predictable way in which you tend to interact with those people around you, and with your environment. While those behaviors are visible, what is unknown is your reason or rationale behind the behaviors. The Communication Styles framework explores how behaviors are exhibited, and does not explore the values and thoughts that generate those behaviors.

It is worth noting that multiple experiences, and even your genetics, contribute to the formation of your Communication Style. For example, maybe your parents have said things like, “My son/daughter has always acted, or talked, that way.” Your Style is formed early. As you learn about Communication Styles, it’s helpful to remember that no Style is better or worse than another. Too often, we seem to value qualities like speaking abilities, without acknowledging the other incredible skill of listening abilities. For that reason, we sometimes have a bias as we learn our results. For example, we might wish our results showed us to be more of a Driver. However, we challenge you to consider the following... envision the person who has been the most memorable leader in your life.

Was s/he a great listener?

Did s/he take time to focus on people?

If your answer is “yes” to these questions, we urge you to ponder the enormous value of the skill of listening. Excellence in listening is a core leadership trait, and one that requires patience and conscientious nurturing.

In the Communication Styles framework, “Style” refers to how you prefer (tend) to communicate or interact with others. Your Style will be understood based on two dimensions:

- 1. *Your tendency to talk, or your tendency to listen
- 2. *Your tendency to focus on tasks, or to focus on people

As you review your Communication Style results, try to remain open to learning about yourself, and perhaps consider how to use self-awareness to become a more effective communicator. The adjustments you make for others’ Styles may be the best development for you as a leader.

And, of course, enjoy the process of appreciating your Communication Style!

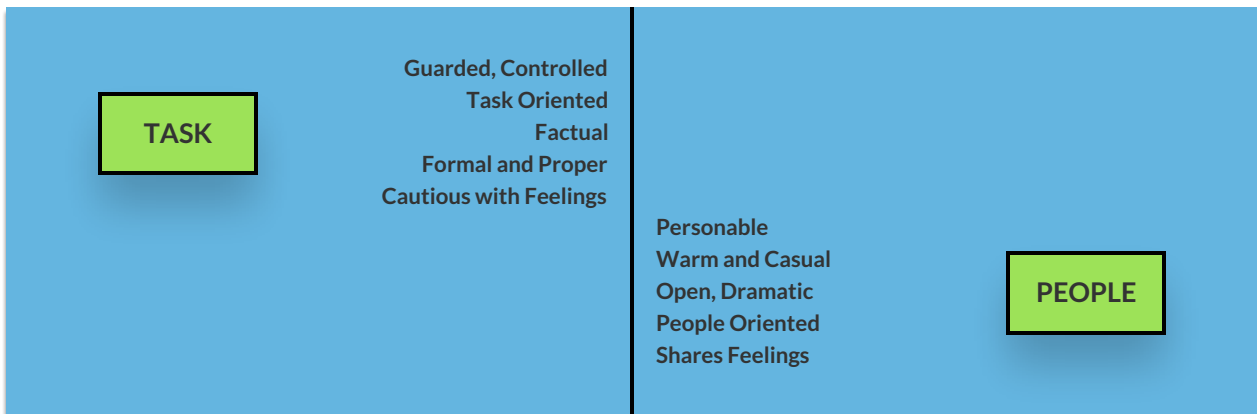

Communication Style Dimensions

There are two dimensions to a person's Communication Style:

ASSERTIVENESS: The degree to which an individual is perceived as direct and forthcoming in the way s/he communicates and interacts with others. Assertiveness is characterized by a tendency to ASK or a tendency to TELL.

FOCUS: The degree to which an individual is perceived as interacting with others in terms of TASKS or PEOPLE.

Describing Your Style - Amiable

DRIVER-AMIABLE

DESCRIPTION: Your primary Communication Style is Amiable. The Amiable Style can be characterized as having an emphasis on people and teams. For Amiables, the key objective at work is to achieve a sense of harmony at work. The Amiable Style greatly enjoys working with others, as long as the team is working well together to achieve their goals. Amiables prefer collaboration, which often translates into moving at a slightly slower pace, to allow for all opinions to be heard.

AMIABLES

- Like to cooperate with others and to carry out the team's goals
- Tend to be slower paced, easy-going, and relaxed
- Their priority is PEOPLE and relationships
- Focus on building trust and getting acquainted with others
- Are irritated by pushy and aggressive behavior
- Enjoy supportive behavior, and rely on close and secure relationships
- Acceptance is based on conformity, loyalty, and helpfulness

COMFORT LEVEL: You may find yourself most comfortable in a work environment that supports an open culture, participative leadership, and teams. You may enjoy a less rushed work pace, with an emphasis on team accomplishments and recognition.

STRESS: You may experience stress in highly political, face-paced environments. While others may let political games go, you may find that they affect you deeply, and you lose productivity when others are faced with competition for resources. When confronted with such conditions, Amiables may appear “checked out” and unsure how to move forward.

COACH'S CORNER: As an Amiable, your first instinct may be to consider work as a place where PEOPLE come together to complete team objectives. Your instinct to hear from everyone during meetings may be exactly what the team needs. However, when the team is confronted with immediate deadlines, your Style may appear to others as hindering their ability to advance. In such situations, you may consider shifting into a “Driver” mode, to help the team gain quick consensus, make decisions, and then develop clear action plans to achieve their objectives.

Your Peer Assessment

Your Secondary Style

While your primary Communication Style best summarizes your approach to interacting with others, your secondary Style also represents a less prominent, but important, way in which you like to communicate.

DRIVER

DESCRIPTION: Your secondary Communication Style is Driver. The Driver Style can be characterized as having an emphasis on tasks and results. For “Drivers,” the key objective at work is to accomplish goals. The Driver Style tends to enjoy working with others, as long as that work is productive, and remains on-task. Drivers prefer an efficient process, which often translates into moving at a quick, targeted pace.

Drivers

- Like to shape the environment by overcoming opposition to accomplish results
- Speak in a direct manner and are self-contained
- Focus on the TASK at hand and on achieving results
- May become irritated by what they perceive as “touchy-feely” behavior, particularly if they sense that behavior is inhibiting immediate action
- Prefer to remain in control at all times
- Rely on their leadership skills to strive to be a “winner”

COMFORT LEVEL: You may find yourself most comfortable in a work environment that maintains a focus on reproducible and accurate processes, along with high-performing teams. You may enjoy a rapid work pace, with an emphasis on goals, and where you feel surrounded by people who share a bias toward action.

STRESS: You may experience stress in emotionally-charged environments, particularly where interactions do not appear to be channeled toward results. When confronted with such conditions, Drivers may try to create more productive conditions, and, in turn, run the risk of appearing demanding or dictatorial.

COACH'S CORNER: As a Driver-Amiable, you have a powerful balance of attention to other people's concerns, while, at the same time, holding a bias toward action. We recommend you leverage these Styles by facilitating meetings. Structure an agenda that includes time to “go around the table” and hear everyone's opinions, while maintaining the attention to time, and to meeting objectives. Your Style may be highly suited to coalescing teams around strategies, and action plans.

Communication Styles

We sincerely hope your Communication Style Assessment offers insight into your preferences for communicating. Further, we hope you understand how your Style is similar, or different, to other Styles.

Recognizing these differences, and adjusting for others to “give them what they need,” in terms of information and style, is a key to strengthening what some refer to as your Emotional Intelligence.

We encourage you to start with small behavioral adjustments, using the Coach’s Corner as a beginning, and notice the tremendous improvements that occur in your interactions.

Please contact us for more information, coaching tips, or with any questions.

Sincerely,

Jim Glantz, CEO
